

Avoid This Mistake In World Of Warcraft

You can earn gold in World of Warcraft in various manner. One of these is by using your profession to gather or craft items and sell those either in the auction house or on the trade channel.

Gathering professions are almost free to level up. The more you gather, the more you develop your skills. No real problems here.

But when it comes to crafting professions, there's a trap. And most people fall for it.

Do Not Forget Your End Goal.

Not only it is practical to make your own enchants, jewels, armor and weaponry, you also no need to buy it from other players.

Your actual goal in having a profession is probably not to level up your skill but to earn more gold.

If you make a quick trip to the nearest auction house, and look at what people put up for sale, you don't get the impression that they are in it for the gold.

It is common to see people selling items like jewelry, glyphs and other crafted items at prices that are tens times lower than what it takes for them to make them.

Now you may probably argue that, if you sell them for more expensive prices, your items will not be sold, since everybody else is undercutting - and you'd be right.

If you can, do not sell.

There are other ways to make money with these items. If prices are so low on your products that you will be selling them at a loss, or not be able to sell them at all, then the answer is obvious. Don't try to sell them!

All your uncommon or green items can be disenchanting. After disenchanting, your rings, weapons, armor, and some other items can turn into dusts and shards. Dusts and shards are free to put up for sale. There is no risk for you to sell them as you do not need to pay any fees if your enchanting materials are not sold. Thus you can avoid undercutting the other prices.

You can ask on trade and pay a tip to the enchanter who assists you. Alternatively you can find somebody in your guild to help you if you don't have a character with enchanting as a profession.

To level up a crafting profession is expensive, but don't make it harder for yourself than you have to. Don't undercut prices, but use your items in a creative way to earn gold, even whilst you're leveling.
